DCLT's D-Y Interns study... ticks!

Last week DCLT volunteers carpooled off Cape to remove invasive plants from the Native Land Conservancy's (NLC's) 'Wampanoag Common Lands' property.

This joint stewardship day represents the ongoing collaborative partnership between the DCLT and NLC.

This past December the organizations signed a 'Cultural Respect Easement' to provide and encourage access to DCLT properties for Indigenous cultural practices.

DCLT interns Sophia Newcomb and Kayly Gleason have worked with DCLT staff throughout summer to sample ticks across town. The goal of their science fair project, part of DCLT's D-Y 'Student Research in Natural Sciences' Program, is to test the tendency of ticks to attach to animal fur versus human clothing, both on and off DCLT's trails throughout town.

Did you know...

Whitetail antlers are covered with "velvet" as they grow each summer season. Once fully formed, by the start of autumn, the velvet is shed so the bucks can put their antlers to good use - either attracting females, or challenging competitors!
